

10-Minute Self-Audit

Open your public offer page and mark the items that are already obvious to a new visitor. Anything you cannot mark is a candidate for your next edit.

Best for newsletter writers, coaches, course sellers, template sellers, and indie creators who want sharper offer clarity before sending more traffic.

What this checks

- First-screen clarity
- CTA and buying path
- Offer proof
- Buying friction
- Quick rewrite prompts

First-Screen Clarity

☐ The first screen names the exact audience, not just a broad market.

☐ The headline says the buyer outcome in plain language.

☐ The visitor can tell what is being sold without scrolling.

☐ One proof signal appears near the first CTA: result, testimonial, customer count, recognizable client, or concrete sample.

☐ The page explains who should not buy or who is not the best fit.

Fast fix:

Rewrite the first screen so it answers: who this is for, what result they get, why to trust it, and what to click next.

CTA, Proof, And Friction

- ☐ There is one primary CTA above the fold.
- ☐ A one-line expectation sits near the CTA: what happens after clicking and when.
- ☐ Secondary links do not compete with the main action before the offer is understood.
- ☐ The page shows what the buyer receives, not only what the product is called.
- ☐ The strongest proof is close to the decision point.
- ☐ Price, scope, delivery, or next steps are visible before checkout.
- ☐ The final section repeats the same primary CTA instead of introducing a new decision.

Quick Rewrite Prompts

Audience

This is for [specific creator type] who want [specific outcome] without [common friction].

Headline

Turn [current painful state] into [buyer-desired state] in [time frame or scope].

CTA helper text

Send [input]. Receive [deliverable] by [time frame].

Proof placement

Move one proof point next to the first CTA before adding more content lower on the page.
